risk for abuse. Controlled substances like Adderall are generally only prescribed by a doctor after an in-person visit.

However, there are many other ADHD medications you can request from our certified doctors online, such as Strattera; its generic version, atomoxetine; guanfacine; and bupropion.

These non-stimulant medications take a few weeks to start working but may treat ADHD as effectively as Adderall without the risk of addiction.

Talk to one of our trusted, board-certified doctors to get these non-stimulant ADHD medications online.

Even though our board-certified doctors cannot prescribe Adderall, we still want to inform you of its uses, side effects, and role in treating ADHD.

those who cannot tolerate stimulants or are at risk for substance misuse. Non-stimulants typically take longer to start working than Adderall but may come with fewer side effects and less risk of dependency. A licensed doctor can help determine the best non-stimulant ADHD medication based on your specific needs and health history.

ADHD Diagnosis An ADHD diagnosis is typically made after getting a history of symptoms, using symptom checklists, and ruling out physical causes for the symptoms.

ADHD Treatment ADHD is treated with medication, therapy, or both.

- Talk therapy is about discussing how ADHD affects you or your child's life and coming up with ways to manage it.
- Behavior therapy focuses on monitoring and changing behavior to manage ADHD.
- Stimulant medications like Adderall and Ritalin increase the amount of dopamine and norepinephrine in the brain. They work quickly but carry a high risk of addiction and side effects. Stimulant medications are controlled substances and can only be prescribed during in-person doctor appointments.
- Non-stimulant medications, usually antidepressants, can also be used to treat ADHD. While the medications take a few weeks to build up in the system and start reducing symptoms, they are generally considered safer than stimulants and you can get antidepressants online when prescribed.
